A question I often get about our mission trips to the Dominican is around the role of evangelism. Do we teach people about Jesus? Within our walls, people usually sigh relief when they find out that we go there to work, not to preach. Outside our walls, people have expressed disappointment and frustration that the trend has been for mission trips to abandon their zeal for spreading the Good News.

So...when the Great Commission says that we are to “make disciples of all nations,” what does that mean?

It makes me think of the gangly pre-teen boys that go door-to-door nervously asking to share the Good News of Christ. I don’t know the best response, but I always send them on their way with the idea that nothing they could say would alter how I make sense of the world, religion, and my place in it all. If we were to drop in on the Dominicans with a similar approach to spreading the word of the Gospel, why in the world would they feel any differently?

Instead, if a group of people show up who have the means to spend their vacations anywhere else and instead invest their time healing your family; building schools for your children; or cleaning trash out of your ditches, how in the world could you close your door?

Instead of going down there to say “Jesus Christ is the only way for your salvation!,” we go to show them, “We love you.” Our conviction in a Creator, who teaches us to live in love and service to one another, drops us on the doorstep of oppressed humanity with open arms. The funny thing is that when we reach out to give and they reach out to receive, God is there on both sides flowing just as freely to us as from us. The act of giving pushes us to think humbly, to care deeply, and to focus on things outside of ourselves, all of which open up space for the Holy Spirit to work and to grow.

So when the Great Commission says to “make disciples of all nations,” I don’t think the aim is for a record breaking head count of future angels on high. I think it’s talking about the never ending process of making disciples that transforms giver and receiver alike. It is a process fueled by our commitment to live the way Christ teaches us to live that opens up a channel for the Holy Spirit to travel from one end of the earth to the other – and back again.
